I ask myself to see. Show me the sin that makes me blind. The clouds of wrong that hide my sun! The pride that vells me from my kind, The sloth that leaves Thy work undone,

The race I-have not run. Wrapped in the mists of self and sin, Groping along a devious way. Am I too late Thy wage to win? To leave the dark and find the day? Oh, drive my night away!

Yet were such wastes before me spread, How could my new born vision bear The blasting sight of woe and dread, The desert's awful gloom and glare; Nor curse my granted prayer?

Lord! that I may receive my sight, Not all my grievous sin to see, To pierce the terror of the night, And into outer darkness flee, But to look up to Thee !

Unveil Thy cross, Thy tender face, The lips whose anguish cried Forgive ! The glory of redceming grace, The love that life and light can give. Lord! bid me look and live. ROSE TERRY COOKE.

LITTLE BROTHER.

BY J. T. TROWBRIDGE

He was not so very little either. He was fourteen years old and as tall as most boys of his age.

But he was a shy and sensitive child, with features almost as delicate as those of a girl. And compared with his big brothers, he seemed fitted well enough by the nickname they had given him. They were great, rough fellows, the youngest of whom, though only seventeen, appeared a full-grown man. That was Luff-a word into which bis real name, Eliphaz, had been appropriately boiled down, Somehow Luff Keeler exactly described the fat, stout, chubby-cheeked, jovial, rude, reckless sort of boy he was.

Then there were Walt, aged nineteen, and Russ, twenty-one; tall, bony, muscular young men, loud-voiced, full of coarse fun and brag. How Milton (that was the name of Little Brother) could have been one of the same family, and retort, yet so wholly unlike these three, was a subject of wondering remark to every-

"Now, boys," he said one day, as he was about leaving home, "don't you go leave him in peace for once, if only to please your mother."

They were digging a well in the cattleyard; they had reached a ledge which they had to blast, and Mr. Keeler was driving to town to get some drills sharpened.

"Now, Milton," he said to Little Brother, who held the gate open for when the explosion came, him to drive through, "help your brothers and don't mind their nonsense." "What you call nonsense is some-
